This dissertation is indeed the proverbial melting pot of people's passions and it's writing is owed to the empathy of a village.

To all of those involved at my three field sites. It is not that fun to let "us" in: we know it, and thank you for taking a chance. I've tried and will keep trying to make it worthwhile. Third Coast friends, I admire your creativity, passion, and commitment to telling this complicated world's many stories beyond what I was able to describe here. Abe, Adrienne, Fat Rice folks, you work fucking hard for your dreams – I aspire to that level of tenacity. Morsel team, you treated me as a professional and an equal, which I've learned not to take for granted, thank you. Ellen, see all of Chapter 3 for a much-abridged version of the love and respect I hold for you. To Chicago chefs, cooks, managers, creators, and producers of all kinds, especially those who took the extra minutes/hours/days to help me translate your innermost thoughts – thank you (Jenn, Patrick, Michael – I mean you).

My family, the wellspring of my food obsessions, where would I be without you? Mom, thank you for a lifetime of meals, baked goods, and recipes; you ignited this pursuit of all things delicious. Mom and Dad, you always expect more than I think I have in me; I appreciate the challenge and thank you for always making me feel like I rise to meet it. Grandmother, you allowed me to never give up on writing as a craft and your last words, as far as I can remember, were "get that damn thing done!" Brother, Dan, I know you love me more than you are willing to admit, coffee relations notwithstanding, and thank you for sharing our pastry addiction. And Lee, my namesake, the trinkets and letters you've sent me along the way to remind me that I always have one foot in outdoor adventureland, have been priceless – I owe you more visits and letters than I can count.

My friends, you are my other family more so than many people with partners and relatives nearby. You have sustained me with your beds, couches, home-cooked meals, ridiculously delicious birthday cakes, boozy concoctions, and regular assurance that you accept me for who I am. To all of those who alleviate my inability to exercise alone– my co-mountain climbers, cyclists, snowboarders, hikers, backpackers, runners, kayakers, canyoneers, canoers – I would be lost without you both mentally and physically.

My advisors, Dr. Shane Greene, Dr. Richard Wilk, Dr. Joshua Malitsky, Dr. Laura Scheiber, and my esteemed friend and mentor, Mark Deuze, you have supported me along the journey to acceptance and, I dare say, success. I know it was an uphill battle – thank you. I would also not have made it through without long-term support of the IU Anthropology Department and the Skomp Endowment Awards.

Rachel Angres, my first Chicago friend, I would have been too lonely to survive in this big city without you. You showed me what it is to be beautiful, strong, willful and fragile – I will take this with me forever. Thank you for introducing me to the community of cyclists who course through the veins of the city. To you beautiful beating hearts on bikes, breathing in the frozen air, delivering hot food in the dead of winter, thanks for letting me in (you know who you are); your story is a part of this too and I would love to tell it someday.
